Cava

In 1872, the Catalonian Josep Raventós made a few bottles of "Agulla" wine after witnessing the magic of Champagne during his travels to France. He soon built a cellar, or cava, to gently mature his creation. This new sparkling wine caught on for its friendliness with Catalan food and was soon widely emulated. Three native Spanish grapes comprise the majority of Cava made today: Macabeo, Xarel-lo and Parrelleda. Cava can be made many places in Spain, but the Penedès region of Catalonia is its homeland and the source of most Cava made today. Cava is typically rich, dry and intense. Its role is to refresh the palate and accompany our food, yet it is just as much at home toasting an occasion.

PRIORAT

The tiny Priorat region in Catalonia produces some of Spain's most intense red wines. Priorat owes its fame to Rene Barbier, who in 1979 planted a mix of Spanish and French varieties in the black slate "llicorella" soils of Gratallops. Llicorella is a cruel, meager soil that forces vines to drive their roots deep for nutrients. These vines yield fewer grapes, but they are of stunning quality and concentration. Barbier was convinced of Priorat's potential and persuaded Alvaro Palacios and three other colleagues to plant small vineyards, or Clos. Together they produced a single red wine for the 1989 vintage, which soon received great critical praise. These five original Clos vineyards showed the world that Priorat was capable of greatness.

SHERRY OF JEREZ

Two ancient winds fight for dominance over the Andalusian town of Jerez de la Frontera, from which Sherry takes its name. These fortified wines develop their personality from this peculiar climate while maturing for decades in grand 19th-century bodegas. Sherry is currently one of the world's most unappreciated wines, but this was not always so. Shakespeare wrote about it, the British Empire's expansion was fueled by it, and even Thomas Jefferson loved it. The dry Sherries we present here are fantastic with Spanish food and surprisingly complex on their own.

VIEJO IMPERIO – 'OLD EMPIRE'

The Crown of Aragón was a massive world power for hundreds of years. Raymond Berengar IV of Barcelona married Petronilla of Aragón in 1137, founding a powerful dynasty. Reaching out to the Mediterranean, they conquered or allied themselves with a vast swath of territory from Southern France through much of Italy, Sicily and even Greece. They sent vines like Garnacha and Cariñena across the sea where they took on their own identity, and this section of our list explores this lasting influence. These grapes still flourish today where they were planted nearly a thousand years ago.

NUEVO MUNDO - 'NEW WORLD'

Our focus is on Spain but we also deeply appreciate the local wine culture here in the northwest. Washington in particular shares many similarities in climate & soil to certain parts of Spain and Italy and as a result we see many of the same varieties grown with success on the eastern side of the state. Tempranillo, Grenache, Syrah are increasingly discovering their identities and styles
